

Auiel Among The Hurons

The novel opens with the discovery, on a construction site, of a manuscript which turns out to be the work of an early seventeenth-century French traveller. The author of the manuscript explains that he wants to tell his real story, which is somewhat different from what he published under the guidance of the religious authorities. Escaping gradually from the habits of his official writing, he tells of his experiences at the end of the Wars of Religion and how he joined the reformed Franciscans (Recollets) with the name of Frere Gabriel Sagard. Some years later, Sagard travelled from Paris to the country of the Hurons and lived with this people for several months. His religious Order called him back to help with its serious problems in colonial politics. He tells how he wrote his two books (1632 and 1636) to show the achievements of the Recollets. His personal story shows the conditions of travel in the seventeenth century and adventures and observations on the river, in the Huron villages and in France. It gives a franker account than the official version of the first confrontation of Amerindian and French, as well as internal conflicts among French traders, missionaries and colonial authorities. The hero also reveals his private life. Friar Gabriels manuscript comes to an uncertain end, apparently broken off while he was on the run from his religious Order. The finders of the manuscript speculate on how he may have returned to Canada as an illegal trader.
