In Front the Palace of Semiramis appears, with the Gardens raised above it on lofty Terraces; on the Right Hand is seen the Temple of the Magi, and on the Left a vast Mausoleum adorned with Obelisks. Enter Arzaces and M i T H R A N E S. A R Z A C I S, Y E S, my Mithranes, by express command, In secret issued from the throne itself, Behold your friend in Babylons proud walls!--Ye powers, how all these wonders that surround us Strike my astonifhd senses, and imprint B A faint.. A faint idea of her noble soul Who plannd these brilliant scenes, these massy towrs! See where yon temple rears its sacred head! See yon fair gardens in the air suspended! View next, with reverence, this monstrous pile By fond affection reard to her lovd lord, This dark abode of Ninus!--O Mithranes! These are immortal works, inferior only To her who raisd them 1 divine Semiramis! MITHRANES. Raise not thus high your hopes, warlike Arzaces, Least when you view this ph?nix of her sex, Grief should usurp the place of promisd joy. ARZACES, Hows this? MITHRANES. The Queen, alas! a prey to sorrow, Here vents those griefs that rend her torturd breast; One while she fills the air with direful shrieks, One while she musing, fad, and silent, sits, And looks like her whose senses are oerthrown By moping melancholy;--then again She starts! and bends her steps towards these shades, Sacred to night, to silence, and to death, And kneeling near the ashes of her lord, She beats her breast, tears her disheveld hair, And calls on Ninus, and her long-lost son. A.r z A c E s. A R Z A C E S. Since when has angry Heaven thus oerwhelmd her? MiTHRANES. Alas twas then, even in that hour of joy, When Babylon with grateful shouts proclaimd Your high ...
