

Ace in Masquerade

Through a clever series of ruses and some luck, a disgraced young naval aviator in World War II assumes the identity of another (killed in a training accident) and goes on to build an air combat record so outstanding that it threatens exposure of his deception. Along the way he marries, by mail, the pregnant lover of the officer he impersonates. She, in turn, is engaged in her own deception. This double deception and its resolution in a court martial is the focus of the novel. The defense counsel for the young aviator is one of the Navys first black lawyers and the court martial portrays some of the racism that existed in the armed services during the war. In the body of the novel there are several realistic scenes of air combat--involving types of aircraft flown by the author. The engines of the novel are the ever-present fear of exposure, the protagonists growing maturity in the crucible of air combat, the mutual love that develops with his by-mail wife, and the perverse result of his air successes that leads to inevitable exposure. The dramatic high points of the novel are the initial scam, several air combat sequences, the protagonists first meeting with his by-mail wife (who until that point does not realize he is impersonating the man she believes she married), and the final court martial scenes.
